Mirna claims that she was given away as a child and that she is product of an affair between Raúl, who was married, and María Elena. The story goes that La India María gave her baby away to one of her domestic workers. Sounds like straight out of a telenovela but stories like these are plausible and more common than one would imagine.

Every one in the painting was a depiction of a real child Velasco met and helped with his foundation. "The painting reveals a story of greater hunger than a plate of rice could satisfy. What these children are starved of is love, not merely material food," Velasco once said. Every child in the painting has a story.
